Nine families have been selected to participate in a new reality "Survivor" like game show that takes place in the middle of the Mojave Desert under a large, automated bio-dome nicknamed, Eden.

This near-futuristic comedy follows the families in their quest to dominate and win the grand-prize of one-million dollars, sponsorships, etc.

The first night of the competition, as the families sleep, every living thing outside the dome suddenly, and without warning, disappears. Aside from Eden, machines requiring electricity cease to operate.

Unaware of the catastrophe, the families inside the dome continue to strive for the prize. Meanwhile, cascading system failures continue the process of eliminating families, one at a time. Playing by the rules, each family leaves willingly and ignorant of the cold, harsh reality of the new world.

Once ejected from the game, the exiles must face the truth and gravity of their situation as they realize that ejection means no way back into the dome. Survival becomes truly paramount and the true nature of working together becomes their utmost priority.

At the end of the game show, the automated systems of the dome exclaim a winner and all doors open allowing free movement to and from the dome. Being the only sustainable source of raw materials, the dome becomes man's new "Garden of Eden".

Although known as Eden, the interior of the dome is anything but as increasing system failures cause sudden a frequent changes in the dome's environment. Survivors must choose between these erratic changes or the harsh, sandy, and wind blown world outside.

This series chronicles the rediscovery of the value of community in the face of human catastrophe. The nine families must learn to live and work together or perish.

If human survival relies on them, we're doomed.
